

The Culinary Trust's Endangered Treasures program, founded by KitchenAid[®], was launched in San Diego, California at the IACP's 24th Annual International Conference at the IDA and Cecil Green Faculty Club, University of California San Diego. The four-course dinner, prepared from late 19th- and early 20th-century cookbooks, marked the beginning of a preservation challenge that the Trust was prepared to embrace.

Endangered Treasures fundraising events are developed from the host city's regional culinary heritage. Event menus are crafted using historical cookbooks and indigenous fare. A food historian is identified in each host city to select historic recipes and to work with the chef(s) to develop a timeless fine-dining experience. This meal is designed to further the importance of regional contributions to our nation's richly diverse culinary history.

The funds raised from the dinner events are invested into the Endangered Treasures Library Fund for The Culinary Trust's cookbook preservation and restoration efforts. Each year The Culinary Trust invites libraries, with significant culinary holdings, to submit an application for the funding necessary to preserve and/or restore historic culinary tomes.

Since the programs inception, The Culinary Trust has awarded over $7,000 and restored several historical culinary works that would have otherwise fallen out of circulation.
